Contradictions of Zionism

The element of time has played a central role in the thinking of the two key players in the Middle East -- the Palestinians and the Israelis. Stalling for time, while usually a tactical ploy in the game-plans of most people, is fundamental strategic thinking in the case of Israel. And on the Palestinian side, the conviction has been passed on from generation to generation that a struggle in the name of a just and honourable cause will be vindicated in time.

The Israelis have always assumed the Palestinians would simply go away with time. But they haven't. The Israelis have also always assumed that they would always have full American support for their policies, but this week shows that they will not. The Israelis have further assumed that more conquered Arab territory will mean more security, but the past ten years of occupation have also proved this thesis absurdly wrong.

These premises -- boldly proved false again these past two weeks -- are based on the fundamental flaw in Zionism -- the belief that Israel can exist as an exclusive Jewish state in Palestine, and that the Palestinians will simply fade away into history. Israel's Prime Minister Menachem Begin had this flaw pointed out to him in no uncertain terms in Washington this week. All of Israel will ponder this point now, under the guise of a domestic political reconsideration. What we are witnessing, however, is nothing less than an open re-examination of the principles of political Zionism and Jewish nationalism, whose inverse side is the historic denial of Palestinian nationalism. In this light, the Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon must be seen as the culmination of the continued failure of Zionism to bring the Jewish people the peaceful home they say they seek.

The Israelis may be on the verge of an important process, long overdue, by which they debate the territorial boundaries and the political realities of their Zionist ideology. It is not only Mr. Begin who is in trouble this week. It is the flawed mythology of Zionist chauvinism that denies Palestinian rights.

Stalling for time and invading south Lebanon, as Israel now learns, will not make the Palestinians disappear. It will only provide more time for the contradictions of Zionism to explode.

"That's war" shrugs trigger-happy Israeli in midst of south Lebanon invasion

Officials still hope to pump remaining oil from stricken tanker

By David Hirst

"WE THOUGHT for sure we had killed you," said the Israeli officer. We had been well aware, as our ordeal lasted, that we were lucky to be still alive. But not until we met our "enemy" did we realise just how lucky. To be mistaken for Palestinian guerrillas in the biggest, hardest campaign Israel has ever launched against them, and to survive the mistake, is an achievement we owe much more to providence than to our own evasive ingenuity.

It happened to three correspondents -- Ned Temko of UPI, Douglas Roberts of Voice of America, and myself -- who had set out from Beirut at 5 o'clock in the morning for a visit to the Palestinian side of the front. It happened in the village of Haditha, 12 kms. north of the Israeli frontier.

Haditha is a Shi'ite-Muslim community which once numbered 2,000 homes. Its tragedy -- to be caught in the classic dilemma of neutrals in the people's wars -- is shared by scores of other towns and villages set in the rolling, open hills of south Lebanon. When we entered the village at 12.30 it was an eerie no-man's land between the opposing forces.

We had left the last Palestinian position -- a handful of men armed with Kalashnikovs qualified as that -- but five miles back on the road from Tyre. An Israeli armoured column, which had entered the village the previous day, had withdrawn earlier in the morning. At first we thought Haditha was empty of its inhabitants too. But a lonely figure approached and he was eventually joined by a train of followers -- grave, saddened men like himself, tearful women, excited children -- who almost dragged us round the village, insisting that we see all the evidence of their misfortune.

As we made this tour of shattered masonry and mangled livestock -- the humans were already buried -- people peered out of doorways. If they took us for Israelis, they raised their arms in instant terror. If they took us for Americans, they pointed skywards and, in their naive belief that Americans are masters of the world, they implored us to "save us from them." "Them" were the Israeli war planes which had visited them the day before.

Our guides insisted, before we left, that we inspect the wreckage of what was once the village's special pride: its new school. It had been built at a cost of $100,000 and, with unenviable foresight, someone had insisted on a basement which could also serve as a shelter. "Come and see it," they said, and in the first of our life-saving flukes we were all going down there when the first tank shells landed.

About 20 came in all. The whole structure shuddered sickeningly. We and our companions huddled into the deepest subterranean recesses -- the latrine, in the one next door to a woman clasped her terrified child and intoned prayers to Allah, Hassan, and Hussein, the masters of the Shi'ite sect.

The villagers began to murmur about an expected airstrike. They scattered to their homes. We stayed. Hardly had they left before the tank-fire resumed. Then after a prolonged silence, we crept out in the hope of discovering what was going on. Spotted, and having come under intense mortar-fire, we took refuge in a concrete crevice which -- providence again taking a hand -- seemed likely to withstand anything but a very near hit.

The mortars kept on coming at intervals. Planes continuously screamed overhead but the air strikes we feared were destined for Tabnine, just across the valley, and targets further north. However, no sooner had our fear of one sort of dying ended than another took its place.

Suddenly small arms fire erupted from all directions. The chatter of machine-guns and the crack of rifle fire moved closer and closer. We could only assume -- very much to our astonishment -- that Palestinians had somehow infiltrated the village, and that before long we would be in the thick of it, with one side or the other taking up positions in the house behind which we sheltered. But it all died away as mysteriously as it had begun.

At nightfall we decided that the best course was to consult the villagers who, we knew, must be going through much the same emotions as ourselves. We walked half a kilometre in the knowledge that if we were passing through anyone's line -- whether Palestinian or Israeli -- they were liable to shoot first and ask questions later.

But finally we made it to the only inhabited part of the village.

We knocked on the door of a house through whose black-out windows we perceived the dim glow of a turned-down oil lamp. "The Israelis are liable to fire at the lighting of a match," an inmate subsequently explained. We were given welcome and a handful of men, women, and children from the village taken for uniformed terrorists -- just about sums up the war the Israelis are waging in south Lebanon. It reflects not just the quality of the information available to

Editor's note: The Jordan Times is reprinting in full the following article from the March 21 issue of the Guardian because of the rare glimpse it gives into Israeli battlefield tactics in southern Lebanon. David Hirst, the Guardian's Middle East correspondent, tells how Israeli troops mistook him for a member of the PLO, shelled his refuge and then overran the position.

In the semi-darkness, we made out the shape of cows and goats on one side of the room and humans lying or sitting on the other side. An old man, wounded in the afternoon's sniper fire, lay silent in a corner. The family had ventured out that morning to scrape a shallow grave for his 17-year-old son, killed in the previous day's bombardment.

"You are our children," said an old woman, "as dear to us as our eyes. If we die, we die together." She embraced us. What food they had they served on two large platters. Then Mohammad Fadil took us to his own house where we tried to sleep -- aircraft and an occasional shell still passing overhead -- amid the bales of his unsold tobacco crop.

At dawn we heard the sound of approaching engines. As the mist rose it unveiled a cluster of tanks and armoured personnel carriers on a nearby hill. Israeli soldiers, clearly relaxed, were standing around. And what the villagers told us could be a hazardous operation -- identifying ourselves to them proved very easy.

It was then that we learned just how lucky we had been. Capt. Uzi Dayan, paratrooper and relative of the foreign minister, is a transparently decent and humane man. When he heard our tale he replied: "I don't like to tell you this. It was I who ordered the shelling of the school. This tank -- and he pointed to a nearby Centurion -- "did it from a distance of 1,200 metres."

Another, British-educated officer filled in some details: "We were sure we had killed you with two simultaneous hits on the top and bottom floors. We were so sure that we did not bother to come and flush you out. I don't like to say it but we assumed that it was just three more terrorists done for." We told him about the basement.

Why had Dayan ordered the firing? "They told me that 12 uniformed terrorists had entered the building."

That misapprehension -- obvious foreigners in motley attire and a handful of men, women, and children from the village taken for uniformed terrorists -- just about sums up the war the Israelis are waging in south Lebanon. It reflects not just the quality of the information available to them, but, at a deeper level, a whole attitude of mind.

The despair which drove the Palestinians to massacre civilians on the Haifa-Tel-Aviv highway is matched -- as a contribution to the mutual hatred of Arab and Israeli -- by a total commitment to the iron fist.

In our six hours' wait for transport back from the front we had a unique, supervised opportunity to talk to ordinary Israelis in action. Two questions kept coming to their lips. One was: "Are there any terrorists in the village?" The other was: "What is the situation?" It amounted to a subconscious admission that we, who had just strayed here by accident, were better placed to tell them than their own much-valued intelligence services.

It was obvious to us, after an hour of ordinary dealings with the villagers, that there were no terrorists left -- or that, if there had been, it would not have taken very long to find out in which houses, if any, they had installed themselves. "We do not deny that they have been here over the years," said a villager. "But they imposed themselves on us. They had all gone before the bombardment. We only wish that just one guerrilla had honoured us by sharing our fate."

Some Israelis are, it seems, incapable of such ordinary dealings with the Arabs. We had intervened in an effort to arrange safe conduct for 100 villagers who wanted to go north. Mohammad Fadil kept saying, as we took him to the Israelis, that they would beat him up. We said: "Don't be silly." But although they did not beat him up, he was more right than we were.

The transformation in some Israeli soldiers was almost pathological. Men who had talked to us in an easy, friendly way turned mean and hostile when confronted with one trembling villager. For the Israelis, it seems, everyone is a terrorist in disguise.

The second insistent question was: "Were any civilians killed in the bombing?" We pointed to a house under which an old woman still lay entombed. We told them that not merely had civilians died, but that they were the only ones who had: it was doubtful we said, if so many as one of the 20-odd houses their air force had destroyed had harboured guerrillas. Yet the soldiers obviously placed more confidence in what we told them about the matter than the official propaganda. One might shrug it off, saying "That's war." Another might fall into embarrassed silence. But some demurred.

In six hours that we sat and watched the bombardment of Tabnine and beyond -- with aircraft and everything from mortars to massive field guns deep inside Israeli territory -- only half a dozen projectiles, mere fire crackers in comparison, came in from the other side. In "cleansing" the Israelis are using the opposite of their usual military techniques of high mobility.

There was, we were told, an overriding consideration: to minimise Israeli casualties. And that, we gathered, stemmed from another: the morale of the ordinary Israeli soldier was not as high as it used to be. Only after the massive bombardment would the infantry go in. It clearly troubled some professional consciences. One sharpshooter confided: "I have killed three terrorists so far, but this artillery is a dirty business."

Reliance on long-range firepower, I suspect, is the real reason why they did not come and get us in the school. And they even used small arms like artillery. What we, crouched in our bunker, had taken to be close-range combat was actually general spraying of the village, or as one officer put it, "a precaution against pockets of resistance." In the course of it -- one wrinkle old villager told the Israelis -- snipers had picked off his 15 sheep one by one for amusement.

There is little doubt that, with such techniques, the Israeli army is effectively "cleansing" the border region of the guerrillas, who, abandoned by the Arab world, stand no chance against overwhelming odds. How far will the Israelis go? "We are ready to go all the way to Turkey," said one officer, "to protect our citizens." That is the ultimate logic of security built on force alone. The Israelis will have achieved a short-term release, but added another layer to the enduring hatred which encircles them.

To leave Haditha, we hitched a lift on the back of Capt. Dayan's tank. A goat was munching placidly at the narrow roadside. It refused to get out of the way, so he ordered his tank to defer to the goat. If that were the spirit which informed all the Israeli army, there might be some prospect of peaceful coexistence, but it certainly does not: it is more like one spared goat to 15 slaughtered sheep.

Private companies mark sharp increase in UAE

ABU DHABI, March 25 (R). -- The United Arab Emirates (UAE) now has 22,949 privately-owned firms compared with 16,998 firms in 1975, according to figures published today in the semi-official newspaper Al Ittihad. The figures, compiled by the Central Statistics Department at the Planning Ministry, showed that the firms employed a total work force of 321,779 persons. No labour figures were available for 1975.

The biggest work force was in Dubai, the second largest of the seven member-states of this Gulf federation, with 135,623 persons employed in 7,133 firms. But Abu Dhabi, the biggest of the states, had the largest number of firms. They totaled 7,467 firms employing 97,240 workers.

BREST, France, March 25 (R). -- With only an estimated 35,000 tons of the original 220,000 tons of oil left on the shattered tanker Amoco-Cadiz, authorities and owners are still hoping to pipe the crude oil from the ship, officials said.

Hundreds of kilometres of the picturesque Finistère coast are already polluted, causing widespread damage to oyster and lobster beds, and to the region's important seaweed industry.

Mr. Marc Becam, coordinating efforts to limit the effect of the oil spill for the French government, told reporters he believed the remaining oil could still be taken off.

All 13 hold-compartments are now breached, and the tanker -- battered by huge waves for eight days -- yesterday settled even further into the sea just one mile off the fishing village of Portsall, north-west of here.

But Mr. Becam said there was no immediate threat to the Normandy Peninsula, to the north-east.

Yesterday afternoon, the French minister met British Junior Trade Minister Stanley Clinton Davis, who had earlier visited the Channel Islands, where contingency plans were being made in case the huge oil slick drifted that way.

Mr. Becam briefed the British minister on measures the French authorities are taking to avoid another coastal pollution disaster.

From Monday, oil tankers will have to keep at least seven miles off the French coast, instead of the present five miles.

Ships entering French territorial waters will have to signal their position and route to the coastal authorities. Vessels within 50 miles of the French coast will have to report any breakdown to the French authorities.

Mr. Becam made it clear these were temporary measures pending international action he hoped would be taken at next month's meeting of the Inter-governmental Maritime Consultative Organisation.

Indian official is bomb target in Australia

CANBERRA, March 25 (R). -- A time bomb was found in the grounds of the residence of the Indian high commissioner here today, police reported. A police spokesman said it was discovered about six hours before it was set to explode.

The Indian High Commissioner, Mr. Jagdish Ajmani, his wife and son and two members of his staff were in the house at the time.

Mr. Ajmani said he later received a phone call at 2.50 p.m., five minutes after the bomb was set to detonate and he believed the caller, who did not speak, wanted to find out if the device had gone off.

The bomb, containing gelignite, was the latest in a series of attacks on the high commission and other Indian institutions in Australia. Mr. Ajmani said the only organisation he knew with a grudge against the Indian government was the Ananda Marga religious sect.

Police said no group had claimed responsibility so far for the bomb.

Project Hand helps out Third World craftsmen

By Kenneth Clark

LONDON, (LPS). — Leatherware from Morocco, baskets from Malawi, raffia bags from Cameroon, mohair carpets from Lesotho, batik work from Kenya, woolsens from Peru, sweaters from Bolivia... all these examples of traditional craftsmanship make a colourful display in the showroom of a new venture called Project Hand.

It began four years ago when an economist, Benny Dembitzer, after travelling extensively in Africa, became interested in helping to market such handmade goods in Britain and opened a shop in a London suburb. The shop did quite well, but Mr. Dembitzer found he was becoming involved in the wholesale trade and a bigger organisation became necessary.

Marketing service

Luckily he met Mr. D. Hidalgo, a former chief of the Africa Division, Development Finance Companies at the World Bank, who had similar interests. Mr. Hidalgo has set up an organisation called FRIDA (Fund for Research and Investment for the Development of Africa).

The aim of FRIDA is to help the development of projects which are labour intensive and use local materials. Many of these enterprises need advice on management, short or long term loans and, of prime importance, a marketing service to buy the goods and sell them to the best advantage of the producers in Europe and North America.

FRIDA has taken over Project Hand, which will be the marketing department of that organisation. I recently visited its office, which is in the Africa Centre building in London's Covent Garden.

Offices in other countries

There I met the deputy managing director, an enthusiastic young man named Edward Millard. Mr. Millard is a graduate of Sussex University with a sound commercial background gained in his family's importing business. He told me that FRIDA has representatives working in Lesotho and Upper Volta, and that more offices would be opened in other African countries soon.

Many of the producers whose work is imported by Project Hand are organised into local cooperatives, with the craftsmen involved in the design, manufacture and administration. Other groups are centred upon community related projects such as children's homes, refugee camps, village industries and so on. Others may be sponsored by governments of the developing countries.

The project has contacts in more than 40 countries.

Retail outlets developed

Mr. Millard and his small staff are giving advice on the best pricing of goods, packaging, documentation and tariff requirements. A great deal of work has been done in developing retail outlets in Britain, but Mr. Millard is looking ambitiously at the bigger markets in mainland Europe and the United States of America.

The big task is to discover the right goods for the right market. Mr. Millard said it is not solely a question of price: Local tastes differ enormously.

The project itself will not be profitmaking. Any profits will be ploughed back into the research and investment activities of FRIDA, which has an initial capital of $6 million.

Bhutto appeals death sentence; process may take up to 6 weeks

LAHORE, PAKISTAN, March 25 (R). — Former Pakistan Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto today filed an appeal with the Supreme Court against his death sentence on charges of ordering a political assassination. His lawyers also filed a separate application asking for Mr. Bhutto to be moved from his condemned cell in the Lahore District jail to better quarters.

Mr. Bhutto has been in the death cell since the Lahore High Court convicted him last Saturday of murder, attempted murder and conspiracy.

The prosecution said that in 1974 Mr. Bhutto ordered his para-military Federal Security Force to kill Mr. Ahmed Raza Kasuri, a member of parliament and a vociferous political opponent.

Mr. Kasuri escaped unhurt when his car was ambushed on the way home from a wedding in Lahore. But his father died in a hall of machinegun bullets. Four members of the since-disbanded force were also sentenced to hang with Mr. Bhutto.

The Supreme Court will hear appeals from all five together. If the appeal fails Mr. Bhutto's only recourse would be a petition of mercy to President Fazal Elahi Chaudhry.

Pakistan's martial law administrator Gen. Mohammad Zia-ul-Haq, who would make a recommendation on a mercy petition, told a television interviewer earlier this week that he expected the Supreme Court appeal to take from three to six weeks.

Mr. Bhutto's appeal ran to 30 pages but his lawyers said they reserved the right to lodge further grounds for appeal later.

They complained to reporters that the high court gave only seven days for appeal while, according to them, the law allows for 30 days.

Gen. Zia-ul-Haq meanwhile said in an interview published in Abu Dhabi that he had no authority to commute the death sentence of Mr. Bhutto as long as the case was still before the courts.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim appealed yesterday for clemency for Mr. Bhutto.

A U.N. spokesman said Mr. Waldheim addressed the appeal to President Chaudhry. In a separate development, Mr. Bhutto's former Finance Minister, Dr. Mubashar Hasan, was arrested here Friday night.

Mr. Hasan, also former secretary general of Mr. Bhutto's People's Party, was detained under a martial law edict which prohibits political activity.

He was sent to the same jail in Lahore where Mr. Bhutto is held.

New U.S. miners' contract approved

WASHINGTON, March 25 (R). — The United Mine Workers Union (UMW) has announced that 160,000 striking miners had voted to approve the contract proposed to end their 108-day walkout.

A UMW spokesman said late last night that with 87 per cent of the vote counted, 56.7 per cent of 55,726 miners approved the contract, compared to 42,391 who voted against.

"If every remaining vote not counted was a no," the spokesman said, "the contract would still pass."

UMW President Arnold Miller said the contract would probably be signed today. He hoped the miners would begin work on Sunday's midnight shift.

But there was some concern that the strike might not be over this weekend.

About 14,000 UMW construction workers have not yet signed a separate contract, which calls for a $1.80 an hour increase, far less than the $2.40 accepted by the miners.

In 1974, a miners' strike was extended because the construction workers refused to settle.

UMW sources in Charleston, West Virginia, said that if the construction workers put up picket lines in front of the mines, the miners would refuse to go back to work.

The UMW spokesman in Washington said he felt this issue would be resolved before the weekend was over.

The U.S. Labour Department said today there were about 23,400 strike-related factory layoffs in the United States last week, the same as the previous week.

The proposal voted on Friday calls for increasing miners' wages by $2.40 an hour over three years. Miners now receive an average of $7.60 an hour.

Arab business tops work of Bahrain's offshore Bankers

BAHRAIN, March 25 (R). — Bahrain's offshore banks were doing about half of their $15.7 billion business with Arab countries, according to the quarterly bulletin of the Bahrain Monetary Agency released here today.

Reporting the positions of Bahrain's 38 offshore banks at the end of 1977 when their business increased almost two fold, the bulletin showed that $7 billion of the banks' assets came from Arab states and $8.3 billion of liabilities were owed by Arab states. But most of the banks' business was done in U.S. dollars.

A total of $11.6 billion of the banks' assets were in the U.S. currency whereas regional currencies, mainly Saudi rials and Kuwaiti dinars, totalled $3.2 billion, almost three times the $1.2 billion at the end of 1976.

Two other important currencies dealt by the banks were Swiss francs ($389 million) and West German marks ($319 million). The banks' dealings remained mostly short term.

Meanwhile, Bahrain's Gulf Weekly Mirror today reported a sharp increase in dealings in Saudi rials in the offshore market.

It said Saudi rial assets at the end of February had risen to more than $2 billion. The newspaper did not give previous figures for rial assets.

It attributed the increase mainly to the practice of the Saudi government of expressing its large contracts in terms of the local currency. It said that this made budgeting easier in Saudi Arabia but left contractors with the job of converting rials into their own currencies.

Contractors also found large amounts of Saudi rials in their possession and were therefore interested in investing them short term or in buying or selling them forward.

Gangland deaths revive speculation of N.Y. mafia war

NEW YORK, March 25 (R). — Five men were killed gangland-style in New York this week — just enough to make police wonder whether they have an underworld war on their hands or just murder as usual.

The best-known name among the five dead was Salvatore "Sally Bugs" Briguglio, who has been linked by federal law enforcement officials to the disappearance of former teamster leader Jimmy Hoffa in 1975.

Briguglio, a short, wiry man who had been warned by the city's organized crime force that his life was in danger, was shot five times in the head outside an Italian restaurant.

He was a close associate of alleged Hoffa arch-enemy Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano, a union leader now on trial in New York for taking part in a bribery scheme.

When "Tony Pro" heard of his death, the usual good humour he had been showing at his trial disappeared. "My heart went like this," he told reporters as he thumped his chest rapidly.

Theories on the Briguglio killing abound, including one that there is a new power at work in the Mafia.

Warning killing

The theory goes that this new power ordered him killed as a warning to Briguglio's gangland associates.

Another is that Briguglio was about to reveal his biggest mystery he was supposed to be keeping — the disappearance and probable murder of Hoffa.

Police and FBI officials had been interviewing him on the case since 1976.

He appeared before a grand jury investigating the case and before a line-up, but he was never charged with anything in connection with the case.

He once told an interviewer: "Nobody knows what I've been through. It's just sickening."

Briguglio was murdered on Tuesday night. On Thursday night four other men with gangland connections and shady pasts were found dead in the city, sparking police speculation that a gang war may be in progress.

First, police found Pasquale "Paddy Mac" Macchiarolo, 57, in the boot of his Lincoln Continental car in the parking area of a Brooklyn supermarket.

He had been dead for some time, and his body, wrapped in plastic sheets, was badly decomposed.

Macchiarolo was a reputed lieutenant in the Vito Genovese crime family and had been under an extortion indictment.

Another murder victim was Americus Scotese, 48, who was shot down in front of his house. He had a record of nearly 20 arrests dating back to 1945.

Patrick Presenzano, 33, was found lying in a Brooklyn street with his throat slit. He had a record of five arrests and police sources said it looked as if he had been thrown out of a moving car.

Anthony "Tony" Di No, shot dead on Thursday as he sat in the bar he owned in Manhattan. Although he had no criminal record, police sources said he had been under investigation for possible underworld connections.

Federal officials have been predicting an outbreak of mob warfare in New York since 1976, claiming that it would be over control of gambling and drugs in the city.

According to officials, the city has five major crime families and rackets worth millions.

At strategic Beaufort Castle, a time of watching & waiting

By Bernd Debusmann

BEAUFORT castle, Lebanon, March 25, (R). — Built by the Arabs, stormed by the Crusaders, started into surrender by Saladin, this mighty fortress is threatening Israel's control over Lebanon south of the River Litani.

"They bombed us, they shelled us, they strafed us, they mortared us. But they couldn't get us out," said a young Palestinian fighter here. "As you can see, we are very well protected."

He pointed to a grey stone wall, slightly chipped in one place. "This wall was hit by an Israeli mortar. But you can hardly see the dent. A solid structure, this."

Perched 715 metres atop a rocky ridge overlooking the Litani Valley, the solid structure is held by commandos of Fateh, the biggest Palestinian commando organisation. From their mountain stronghold, they have a commanding view over key villages in occupied southern Lebanon.

"Down there you see Kleya, next to it Khirbe, further south Deir Mimas. A little to the east is Metullah, the northernmost town in Israel," the fighter said. All are within range of mortars and artillery from Beaufort Castle.

So is the easternmost of the three bridges over the Litani, apparently the limit the Israelis set themselves for their advance on the ground. Israel's air force has hit targets as far north as Beirut since the invasion began on March 16.

"To have complete, undisputed control over Lebanon south of the Litani, you must have Beaufort Castle," said a western military expert in Beirut.

But Beaufort is difficult to take. Artillery and mortar make little impression on a structure with walls up to two metres thick. Deep vaults carved out of natural rock provide shelter from air attacks.

A ground attack from the east, from Israel and Lebanese areas under Israeli control, would have to overcome a vertical precipice of more than 350 metres.

When Saladin, the Sultan of Egypt, besieged Beaufort in 1192, the knights and soldiers in the castle poured burning oil on their attackers. Today's defenders have heavy machine-guns, mortars and light artillery.

Siege thought unlikely

The Fateh fighters here do not talk of capitulation and think a siege is unlikely.

Arnoun, the village at the foot of the castle, was turned into a heap of blackened masonry and rubble by Israeli artillery, and bombing runs as Israel's ground forces pushed up to the Litani River.

The shops that used to supply the castle no longer exist; the farmers have joined the vast exodus of civilians from the south. But supplies are still being brought from Nabatieh, seven kilometres to the west.

Though many of the original vaults and underground passages are no longer usable, the latest defenders of the strategic fortress appear to have no shortage of storage space for ammunition and supplies.

"Don't be too curious, this is not for public view," a Fateh man told the rare civilian visitor who attempted to peer into the darkness of one of the vaults here. There were green boxes of machinegun ammunition in a passageway nearby.

The latest chapter in the story of the castle opened in November 1976, when Israeli-backed rightists and their Palestinian and Lebanese leftist foes took the civil war to the south after it ended elsewhere with the entry of a Syrian-dominated Arab League peace force.

Since then, gunners and mortar-men here have exchanged thousands of rounds with rightwing forces in Kleya and nearby Marjayoun. Israel's invasion added aerial bombardments.

The unilateral ceasefire declared by Israel earlier this week brought relative calm to Beaufort, but with it last?

"Who knows," said an officer, "we will remain here. We shoot back if we are shot at. We watch and wait."
